Vobsub, .Srt, .Dvdauthor and .dvdsub -with the same interface as the.VOB player.Vobsub is very easy to use and you can set them very easy : - Drag and drop your subtitle file in the form to edit, or if it already exists in the.VOB (inside the corresponding DVD subfolders), - insert the desired time in the form and press "update" to see the new subtitles . You can also use the edit menu to do the same. A unique feature of .Vobsub is that you can choose to play the original audio file and see the subtitle in real time, but also the reverse, playing the subtitle while listening to the original audio track. I want to make sure that only one instance of my App is running at a given time. I know that I can add an auto lock to my app when it first launches but I'd like to do this on a case-by-case basis. I don't think that the auto-lock on the first launch will be working on devices that I need it to be working on. Is there a way that I can make sure only one instance of my App is running at a given time on the device? A: There's nothing Android-specific about this. There is no way to prevent the OS from killing your process for any reason. If you want to prevent your app from being killed, you will need to either use some form of Android-specific code to prevent it from being killed, or ask the user to explicitly approve the kill. If your device is rooted, you might be able to prevent it from being killed, but this is a very bad idea because it opens the device up to potential security threats.
